

"We will divide the booty." The Emperor superintended the distribution himself, and presented bottle by bottle to his comrades, till tired of this occupation he called out to Bertrand, a Grand Marshal, assist me, if you please. Let us help these gentlemen. They will help //, some day." It was with his species of bonhimut that he (Captivated when he chose all round him. The following day he was employed in various Transignments, and among others in dictating to Colonel Kaoul the proclamations to be issued on his landing. In one of these, after observing, "we must forget that we have given aid to the neighboring nations," Napoleon stopped, "What have I said?" Colonel Uuoul read the passage, "Stop!" said Napoleon. "(<)init the word 'neighboring;' say simply to nations." It was thus his pride revealed itself, and his inhibition seemed to rekindle at the very recollections of his former greatness.

Napoleon landed without any accident on the 1st of March, at Cannes, a small seaport in the Gulf of St. Juan, not far from Fréjus, where he had disembarked on his return from Egypt six years before. In France and where he had embarked the preceding year for Elba. A small party of the garrison who were sent to meet him before the neighboring garrison of Intervi's Warrington, prisoner by General (formerly) Clouzel of the place, soon afterwards hinted that it was not right to proceed till they had released their comrades, but then the Emperor observed that this was a poorly to intimate the magnitude of the undertaking; but they were 40,000 men with the view to art free! However, when the Comte de Haris was called on to try what he could do, calling out after him, "Take care you do not get yourself into a worse position too!"

At nightfall the troops were on the march. Just before a postilion, in a splendid livery, had been brought to him out that the man had formerly been a friend of the Emperor's. He was now in the hands of the French of the Moiti, who himself had been a friend of the King. He was at the finding of the Emperor's that with put to
